XAMA'S QUESTION

I think we can say with a high degree of probability that the spaceship from Earth will finally reach our planet and make a successful landing," admitted Ghane Dnob, head of the Venutian Outerplanetary Commission. "At least you must give those Earthlings a lot of credit. They just keep on trying and trying. For that is the spirit that never gives up."

"But what kind of creatures are they?" asked Enire Reziar, head of the Venutian Government. "We have been making all kinds of wild guesses. Are they green in color? Are they blue in color? Do they have one eye in the center of the head? Or two eyes? Or perhaps three eyes? Have they six arms? What kind of food will they need? Can we give them Sebto as a drink or do they need water? That and a thousand other questions need answering. What are we going to do?"

"If we could make contact with their spaceship we would at least be one degree towards success," continued Ghane Dnob. "Then there is the question of language to be considered. Do they understand anything similar to Venutian? Have they the power of thought transference? If our scanners could only get inside the metallic hull of their spaceship we might be able to see what they look like."

"There is another possibility," suggested the head of the Venutian Government. "Once there was contact with Earth. But that was in the days before the great tragedy, when their entire civilization was almost wrecked, and famous Xama Noslofon was the only survivor to return to our planet. Unfortunately we have no records to tell us exactly what he saw or did. All we have are the numerous and alas, worthless legends, that have grown up around his famous exploits."

"His descendant, Stogo Noslofon is still alive," pointed out Ghane Dnob. "I think he is about the oldest inhabitant on our planet. I will visit him and ask him if he still can remember any of the stories told to him by his father who got them from his famous grandfather."

"Do that," ordered Enire Reziar. "Meanwhile I shall go ahead and make plans for the welcoming of the spaceship when it arrives here. We shall have to set up a magnetic beam and bring it down slowly and safely at our airport on Zariba."

Stogo Noslofon was seated comfortably on the veranda of his summer home at Lebasi near the extinct crater of Relsit. He was unable to arise and greet Ghane Dnob.

"Please forgive an old man who finds it hard to move," he apologized. "It is not a lack of courtesy. Merely that I happen to be so old, that I myself wonder whether or not it is true or false that I am the patriarch here."

"It is true," smiled Ghane Dnob. "Just rest comfortably in your chair. I assume you have heard all the rumors about the spaceship from Earth. It is true. We expect them in the week of Lillineil. But we need your help."

"Whatever help I can give, that I shall be glad to do," responded the old one. "You have but to ask and I am at your service."

"What can you tell us about the way these Earthlings look?" asked Ghane Dnob. "And what shall we give them as food?"

"All I can tell you is the story of the museum visit which my father told me when I was a boy. And remember, he got it from the lips of my famous ancestor. It is a story which I have not told before. Yet every detail in it is clear."

"My ears are all attention," smiled Ghane Dnob. "For what you tell me will certainly be of great value to all of us."

"Xama Noslofon on his visit to Earth was taken to a great museum of natural history. In it they had many exhibits of animals and peoples of the past. I would assume something very similar to our museum at Sliftababa. There on a shelf he saw a pile of cubes. The size of these cubes represented the amounts in which the different chemical elements occurred in an average Earthling. There were such chemical elements as hydrogen, oxygen, carbon, nitrogen and so forth. On each cube there was also an inscription which gave the current market prices for each chemical. I think it all totalled up to a sum of about $62.00 in American money. For this museum was in a country called America. Then there was a chart telling you that about 70% of an Earthling consisted of water. That is all I remember of the story.

I have tried my best to picture an Earthling. It is not for this very reason I never told the story before. For my brain powers are unable to picture exactly what an Earthling is. I try to see a molecule of Oxygen with a molecule of Carbon. I shudder at the result. Is this an Earthling? Or I try to picture a big jar filled 70% with water. Is this an Earthling?"

"I am greatly indebted to you for the valuable information you have given to me," said Ghane Dnob. "In view of it, I feel we can make certain plans which will enable us to welcome the Earthlings in the best manner possible."

An extraordinary session of the Outerplanetary Commission had been called. Ghane Dnob was speaking to the members of it.

"Needless to say, we are not the only planet interested in knowing what the Earthlings look like. Mars and Jupiter have informed us that they too wish to know all we learn about the Earthlings. For it is reasonable to predict that soon they will visit the other two planets with which we have had the most friendliest of relations for many years.

"It is important that we take steps to protect the Earthlings once they land upon our planet. It is reasonable to assume, from a logical viewpoint, that if they exist within the confines of their spaceship, they can continue to do so when their spaceship lands here. It might mean that all negotiations will have to go on within their spaceship. However, they may wish to see our wonderful planet.

"In that case we will have to take safety measures. We shall have on hand plastic coverings to protect hydrogen, oxygen, carbon, nitrogen and water. Our problem will be with the nitrogen. For on our planet, free nitrogen can't exist. It must be in combination with something else. I do not know whether or not in the Earthling the situation is that of free nitrogen or not.

"Therefore I commission Suiluj Mùab to take care of these matters."

"What about the school children who want to be on hand when the spaceship lands?" asked one of the members of the Outerplanetary Commission.

"Our counselor on Education and Manners is taking care of that detail," he replied. "The children have been informed that they are not to show surprise no matter how strange or funny the Earthlings look. There is never a substitute for good manners. We have told the children to reverse the situation. Imagine that we were landing on Earth for the first time. How strange we would seem to the Earthlings. Yet we would expect courtesy. So to expect it, one should give it."

All over the planet the visuo-screens had been adjusted to the frequency of 2398 togcycles. There was only one topic of discussion. "The Earthlings. What are they?" Pictures had been drawn and the artists had tried their best to give the average Venutian some concept of an Earthling.

A tiny speck was above the planet. The magnetic beam was now in operation. It swung in a semi-arc and thus was able to neutralize the effect of the jetto-blasters that were operating the large spaceship. Commander Howard Johnson, in charge of the operational section of the spaceship was wise enough to figure out that some kind of a force was now taking charge of his spaceship.

Gently and safely the craft was brought down to a perfect landing at the airport on Zariba. The doors were sealed and not as yet opened. All the people had adjusted their space helmets. However, Commander Howard Johnson looked at his analyzer and smiled.

"We can breathe this atmosphere. No need of the space helmets. Let us remove them. And remember our manners. No matter how funny or different these Venutians look, let us always be in control of ourselves. There is no substitute for good manners."

The emergency police force was in action. They were keeping back the countless numbers of Venutians who were on hand to greet the visitors from Earth. Who knows? Without that emergency police force they might have rushed upon the field with but one thought in mind: Get a souvenir to take home for the kids.

There was a strange silence as the metallic door of the spaceship started to swing up. Enire Reziar felt a strange kind of a chill going down his spine. In the fraction of a second he would know just what an Earthling was. The door was now opened and a ramp reached the ground. There they were! An Earthling in a uniform came up and spoke:

"I am Commander Howard Johnson. I hope we are welcome and you understand what I am saying."

"I certainly do," smiled Enire Reziar as he realized that the Earthlings were — exactly the same humans as on Venus!

And then the cheering started and it didn't stop for half an hour.
